

Excerpt from Memoirs of Frederica Sophia Wilhelmina, Vol. 2 of 2: Princess Royal of Prussia, Margravine of Baireuth, Sisiter of Frederick the GreatThe year 1732 introduced a new epoch. I had for some time past suffered much indisposition, the cause of which I attributed to the continual agitation of a mind oppressed by adversities. I wished to attend to my devotions, and went to church, but fainted during the service and remained insensible for some hours. On my recovery, I found myself in bed surrounded by a crowd of persons who had run to my assistance, and among the rest, the queen. The physician decided that I was breeding, on which subject the company amused themselves greatly; but I paid no attention to anything that they said to me, I suffered too much; I had several faintings during that day, which prevented my rising. The queen sent me word the next morning that she would pay me a visit in the evening to celebrate Twelfth Night. It was but a sad festival, and all present seemed to have fears for my life. Tears were in every eye; I took a tender farewell of the margrave Philip. My marriage had not altered our friendship, and I felt sensibly affected in separating from those I loved.The next day, the 7th of January, we removed to Potsdam. The king received me with open arms.About the PublisherForgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books.
