

Short story from the Bottom Drawer Publications 2013 Valentines Day collection. Mason Jackson knows his marriage to Bridget is in trouble. He's been putting in exhausting hours for months to try to make partner in his accounting firm. He knows that it is putting a strain on his marriage, but he has trouble escaping the memory of the poverty of his childhood. He never wants his wife, or the children they yearn for, to know the struggle that he endured when he can provide a better life for them. But things are reaching breaking point; he and Bridget are more like roommates than a married couple. He needs to think of a way to get their marriage back on track and what better way than to make Valentines Day, Bridget's favorite holiday of the year, a new start for their marriage? Mason puts in place plans for an elaborate evening designed to surprise Bridget. Bridget is miserable in her marriage, and often longs for the days when they were dirt poor. They may have struggled financially, but at least she had her husband around. Mason is always working, and Bridget feels that he has chosen his work over her. She's tried to talk to him about the way she feels, but he doesn't seem to hear her. He just keeps telling her that once he makes partner then everything will be all right. But Bridget is sick of Mason forgetting the things that are important to her - like their anniversary a few months ago. She is at the end of her tether and decides that if he forgets Valentine's Day, her favorite day of the year, then divorce just might be on the cards. At the end of the day, this couple has only one decision to make: Time or Money?
